MAT (Medication –Assisted Treatment) Recovery in a Bottle: For Best Results.... Michael Palladini, RPh, MBA

What do the drugs methadone, buprenorphine and naltrexone contribute to recovery? That question has various answers, depending on who is asking and who is answering. Saving lives has become a priority. Many find hope in MAT with the medications listed above. Many others believe that recovery is based on the individual's effort, and that medication hinders that effort. Still others are unsure and believe that any and all 'tools' should be used.

This course will review the biological basis of opiate dependency and the proposed mechanisms of MAT medications on the symptoms of opiate withdrawal and recovery. Available data produced in clinical trials will be explored. New models of treatment based on medication delivery, treatment team coordination and individualized, patient-centered care that acknowledges challenges, limitations and benefits will be considered.

Learning Objectives

Participants will:

1. Review and become familiar with the history of medication use in opioid dependence
2. Understand the biological responses to opioids and the basis for medication use
3. Become familiar with the medications used, regarding use in treatment, pharmacology and best practice guidelines
4. Review the evidence and clinical trials of each medication and the outcomes-data
